In the last few years Time to Dream : Book 3 (The Wildrose) interest has turned to the lives of aging people, and to the condition of being old in this society, and inevitably, to the issue of ageism and how it blights the lives of those advanced in years, but still very much alive and capable, and also, how society is greatly diminished by its unwillingness to accept aging and the aged. Sharon, now growing aged herself, thinks society fails the elderly massively, that there is no comprehensive 'handbook' for understanding the old and their psyches and needs, and further, that the old, because this is the first generation to live so long and to make up such a large percentage of society, are often struggling to define themselves and to find a way to live that is satisfying and fulfilling.
