This living canonical memory is brought forth by the Spirit, the power which continually renews, enriches, and revitalises this memory. Although he wanted to put an end to the quest for the true 'life of Jesus', Schweitzer himself unwittingly wrote just such a life himself: If Jesus' life and death are entirely shaped by his eschatological, apocalyptic expectation of the kingdom of God, then the history of his life is an 'eschatological' history. Redemption takes place in the vertical sense as a standstill of time, or as a contraction of time into a new future qualitatively different from the linear future of time, which is a quantitative summation.

This concept about Trinity leads to a creative and communitarian spirituality.

Or does God himself suffer in Christ on our behalf? The cosmos shows no 'traces' of the deity; on the contrary, it is full of traces of man.

On the other hand, talk of the Spirit's power and public recognisability before

Barth, Althaus was convinced by the experiences of the First World War that all human values and conditions are without exception doomed to die, because they are historical, and are subject to the judgment of eternity.
